What Is Included in Employment History Background Checks

Employment history background checks typically include details about a candidate's previous jobs, such as job titles, employment dates, employers' names, and sometimes reasons for leaving. The purpose is to confirm that the information provided by the applicant is accurate and consistent with the records held by past employers. However, the depth of the information can vary depending on the background check provider and the employer's requirements.

Typical Data Points in Employment Verification

When a background check includes employment history, these are the common elements that are verified:

- Names of previous employers
- Dates of employment (start and end dates)
- Job titles and roles held

- Salary or wage information (less common, but sometimes requested)
- Reason for leaving (if disclosed)
- Eligibility for rehire (occasionally)

Variability in Information Displayed

It is important to note that not all background checks will include every detail listed above. Some checks may only confirm employment duration without disclosing job titles or salary. Additionally, some employers may choose to limit the information shared due to company policies or privacy regulations.

Types of Background Checks That Show Employment History

Understanding which types of background checks typically show employment history helps clarify what applicants and employers can expect. Employment history is most commonly verified through specific background screening services tailored for this purpose.

Employment Verification Checks

These checks are designed explicitly to verify the employment history provided by a candidate. Background screening companies contact previous employers or use databases to confirm employment dates and positions held. Employment verification checks often form part of the standard pre-employment screening process.

Comprehensive Background Checks

Some comprehensive background checks include multiple components, such as criminal records, education verification, credit checks, and employment history verification. In these cases, the employment history section provides a detailed look at past work experience alongside other relevant findings.

Self-Reported Checks and Database Searches

There are also background checks relying on aggregated databases that compile public records, social media profiles, and other sources. These may or may not include detailed employment history, and the accuracy can vary significantly compared to direct employer verification.

How Employment History Is Verified

Employment verification methods vary but generally involve direct contact with previous employers or the use of third-party verification services. The goal is to confirm the accuracy of the job titles, dates, and employment status reported by the candidate.

Direct Employer Verification

In this traditional method, the background check provider reaches out to human resources departments or supervisors at previous workplaces. They verify the candidate's employment dates, positions held, and sometimes additional details like job performance or reasons for leaving.

Third-Party Verification Services

Many companies use specialized verification services that maintain databases of employment records or have established contacts with employers to expedite the verification process. These services can provide faster results and reduce the risk of fraudulent information.

Use of Online Databases and Public Records

Some employment verification relies on publicly available information or proprietary databases that aggregate employment data. While these can provide quick access to employment histories, they may not always be comprehensive or up-to-date.

Limitations and Common Issues in Employment History Reporting

Despite the importance of employment history in background checks, several limitations and issues can affect the accuracy and completeness of the reported information. Being aware of these factors is crucial for both employers and job candidates.

Incomplete or Inaccurate Records

Not all employers maintain detailed or easily accessible employment records. Smaller companies or organizations that have closed may not be able to confirm employment, leading to gaps in the history reported.

Time Constraints and Verification Scope

Some background checks only cover a certain number of years or the most recent jobs. This limitation means older employment history may not appear on the report, even if it was provided by the candidate.

Discrepancies and Disputes

Differences between the candidate's self-reported information and what employers confirm can lead to discrepancies. Misunderstandings, clerical errors, or deliberate falsification can cause issues during the hiring process.

Privacy and Employer Policies

Some employers have strict policies about what information they will disclose during verification. They may only confirm dates of employment without providing job titles or salary details.

Legal Considerations and Privacy Concerns

Background checks that include employment history are subject to various legal regulations designed to protect candidates' privacy and ensure fair treatment. Awareness of these laws is critical for employers conducting background screenings.

Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA) Compliance

In the United States, the FCRA governs how background checks are conducted and how information is used. Employers must obtain written consent from candidates before conducting employment history verifications and provide copies of reports if adverse decisions are made based on the findings.

State and Local Regulations

Beyond federal laws, states and municipalities may have additional rules regulating background checks, including restrictions on the types of information that can be requested or disclosed.

Candidate Rights and Dispute Processes

Candidates have the right to dispute inaccurate or incomplete information found in background checks. Employers and screening companies are required to investigate and correct any errors to maintain compliance with applicable laws.

Confidentiality and Data Security

Handling employment history information requires strict confidentiality to protect candidates' personal data. Employers must safeguard records and limit access to authorized personnel only.
